The camera angle is also very important. For example, a bedside pose can be a perfect way to hide the height or simply kill the shot. Note that Michael Keaton is only six feet old and played Batman convincingly with proper camera angels. Do not make the full length, cut on the thigh. Well, the photographer can wear heels too if he wants to, but it probably won't affect the photo. A subtle reflection of the feet will give the illusion of longer legs... see Zack Arias' White Seamless tutorial for setup. for stuff for fun things Unless there's something else on the board that scales, I find it hard enough to judge a person's height from a simple photograph. There's no need to get close and use a wide angle lens, just your normal lens, probably 55mm on your 5D if you can go back about 10 feet. It makes the model look a lot taller than she really is. I do it all the time in my studio - I have to be careful that I don't get part of the ceiling in the frame. I wish my studio had a higher ceiling sometimes. As someone mentioned, having the model lying on the floor is also good. Get down there yourself so you're at the shooting level. My current canons: 5D, S90, 7D, 550D. Current lenses: Canon 28 1.8, 50 1.8, 85 1.8, 100 2.0, Sigma 50 1.4, Tamron 28-80 2.8. Tamron 75-200 It's pretty much a rule of photography already, that the farther away you're taking the image the smaller the camera should be, yes, yes, I know, not everyone does that, but a big shot can be made outside of those rules. But the data is the level of the eyes for head shots. Shoulder level for half body and low to waist level for full body photos. If you are a little lower than normally your subject will appear higher. I shot with a model this summer that's 5-2. And while she doesn't look tall, she seems more normal shooting her this way.www.darksilsemag.com keep them away from fences that are taller etc.... If you're in the studio it's easy to control. use smaller props (or don't use any props) and that's it. Outdoors, move the model away from anything that is a dead-sized donation. Very large objects (e.g., see, sky, flat earth, tall trees) do not affect the perception of size, as all are small compared to them. Things we know of fixed size, such as cars, motorcycles, doors, etc... will give the height of the model very quickly. In this case, use the distortion techniques mentioned above. use a 17mm tse, low shot Most fashion models signed by the agency are at least 1.80m tall, although most are even taller, and many glamorous models are usually much more It's not that a glamour model couldn't go out of style, it's just that major fashion modeling agencies prefer models closer to six feet. And while the attitude of the model model agency Tall models can annoy a shorter model, you as a photographer can always make a short model look and look much taller. In this pose, the model's extended leg helps lengthen her body and make her look taller. The rule is simple in order to make a short model taller, you as the photographer must shoot from a low angle and go back in the old days of filming for Playboy, your golden rule was that the camera lens should not be higher than the level of the navel of the person. Basically, it's all about lens perspective. When a photographer shoots down a model, the model gets shorter and heavier and when a photographer shoots forms a low-upward angle, the model becomes taller and slender. Candice is six feet tall, but here, a short dress and heels plus a low shot angle makes her look taller. It's an easy photographic technique to do, but you'd be surprised how many photographers fail in this simple fundamental in photography. Personally, I saw this flaw of photographers working with models simply because the photographer was simply lazy to kneel or even lie on the floor and shoot up. Obviously shorter photographers have a built-in advantage. The legs in general are more attractive in most applications of glamour and nude when they appear longer and thinner. With shorter subjects, we simply shoot from a lower angle and upward toward the subject, taking care not to emphasize the norins. A little butterfly, or paramount lighting, creates shadows under the nose and helps subdue the nostos. The selection of lenses is also important. For heavier subjects, avoid lenses shorter than 85mm, especially a 50mm, as they tend to naturally add weight to the subject. My favorite in this situation are the actual main lenses like an even longer 85mmor focal lengths. Back in the days of filming in Playboy, its pattern was no less than 150 mm on a 35mm DSLR. Now, while it's no secret wide angle lenses from a low shooting angle can pretty much make anyone look like a giant when it comes to glamour or even fashion photography, the rule still applies, shooting navel level or lower. This loud and often giant effect on your subject's legs when captured with wide-angle lenses is caused by distortion and not every distortion flatters your model, something to bear in mind. Posing Short Models While posing, the model extends her body and avoids slouching poses. Other ideal poses are the model lying on the bed, facing the camera, resting on the elbows and her body turned at a more dramatic angle where when shooting a horizontal of this pose her feet go towards the top corner of the frame and her arms at the lower end opposite of the frame, forming a pleasant imaginary diagonal line. If you're model gets in your pose, have your high heels that to lengthen the legs and shorter clothes that reveal more of the legs because these techniques give the perception of long legs as well. The more legs are are the longer they will look simply from the perception of the human mind. It is often said that perceptions are everything, so something else to consider when it comes to perceptions, pay attention to your past. Avoid backgrounds where anyone who has seen the final photo can relate the height of a model to the background. In this image, this 6-time tall model appears taller with the dog used for scaling, and the shooting angle low. Scale counting For example, when a model is next to a car, especially a shorter model, it is a must shoot from a low angle, because cars have an average between 1.80 m and 1.80 m high for SUV's and trucks. Similarly, do not place a short model next to a garage door, as its average height is seven to eight feet. The same is true of internal doors that, on average, are 1.80 m high. The idea is not to give the viewer anything in the background or next to the model that can indicate their height through the perception of scale. The same goes if your model posing next to people of average height, she will only look at the average height, she will only look at the average height and it's you who rarely sees Tom Cruise, who's only six feet tall alongside tall people. So when you put a shorter person next to your short subject, the perception again is that your main subject is high because they are obviously taller than the person next to her. This is a common trick used in movies and TV shows, if a lead actor is tall, the casting director will cast people who are smaller than the lead actor and if the actor is short, they avoid casting taller people alongside the lead actor. Another trick is in post-production, as is in the film Lord of the Rings, according to Wikipedia, The human-sized characters (Gandalf, Aragorn, Boromir, Legolas) were filmed in a second take, and the two shots were composed on a different scale to make an image, making the initial shot of the Mid-Hobbit character appear smaller. In summary, maintain a lower camera angle than the subject's navel and use the appropriate lens based on the result you want to achieve. Also consider the scale relative to the size of other people or objects near or around your model. Most models are not fashion models signed by the agency, especially when it comes to glamorous photography, but if you follow the above techniques as a photographer, most viewers of your images will never know that you made a shorter model look taller.
